Endura claims a monumental  $60,000\text{g}/\text{m}^2/24\text{hr}$  for the flagship three-layer waterproof Exoshell60 material that makes up the MT500; a breathability figure that comfortably blows just about every other fabric out the water.

Intelligently, Endura hasn't just relied on the fabric performance for removing moisture; ventilation options are here in spades, with adjustable hem, cuffs and collar backed up by massive pit zips dropping to the waist.

The cut was excellent on the bike and a low backside gave great rear-end coverage, while the hood was generous and effective, with two types of volume adjustment available and a handy retainer to keep it in check when tucked away.

In fact the only feature we didn't like was the internal Lycra cuffs — comfortable at first, but when they soaked up rain, which they invariably did when out for long periods, they felt clammy and took an age to dry.

Clammy cuffs cost
the MT500 a point
