If we were to design a packable jacket, the result wouldn't be a million miles away from Endura's MTR Emergency Shell. Bulk and weight is kept to a minimum with an unfussy design — light, elastic cuffs and no pockets — backed up by a lightweight waterproof fabric that cuts a compromise between weight and durability. Taped seams also help keep the weather at bay.

The neat fit keeps flapping fabric and internal draughts to a minimum, but we did find the lack of ventilation meant it got a bit clammy when working hard on the climbs.

On the upside, the dropped tail protects you from wheel spray, and it was finished off with a neat elastic strap to keep it rolled up in your pack. A well-considered jacket, at a very reasonable price.
